Crime victims or young carers? Children exposed to domestic violence and complexities in policy and practice

Chair: Carolina Overlien

In many cases of domestic violence, there are children living in the family. These children often take on a lot of responsibility for the situation at home. In cases of systematic violence, it is typically the children's mother who is subjected to violence by their father. Parenting -the capacity for child-centered care - is of key importance for children's opportunities for recovery after experiences of violence. When the capacity of care is limited, children's responsibilities tend to increase to the extent that they may be defined as young carers. However, children's exposure to domestic violence and their positions as next-of-kin and young carers have long tended to be treated as separate issues: in different forums and to some extent by different researchers and different groups of practitioners. This presentation aims to bridge such gaps in knowledge and practice. There is a lack of interventions that explicitly pay attention to children exposed to domestic violence as next-of-kin. This is especially true when it comes to children who are also young carers in relation to either the adult victim or perpetrating parent. Much remains to be done to develop interventions to protect and support children who are both next-of-kin, young carers and exposed to domestic violence.

Moving from health care response to domestic violence towards trauma-informed health care systems: a dialogue on global lessons and challenges

Chair: Nicky Stanley

The World Health Organization identifies the crucial role of an effective health system in prevention of domestic violence and abuse and mitigation of its long-term damage to health and wellbeing of survivors and their families. Early engagement in health care settings has a growing evidence base, yet needs further research, support and implementation strategies to ensure pathways to safety and well-being for families. The Bristol Research on the Intersection of Gender Health and Trauma (BRIGHT) group has used a wide range of methods, in collaboration with domestic abuse agencies and survivors, to develop and test interventions to improve the response of primary and sexual health services. Safer Families Centre, an international centre of research excellence addresses the problem of inadequate identification and response to domestic abuse and family violence in health services. The potential of the health sector to reach families is large, as most of the population is in contact with health services on a regular basis. We will draw on research from the last 15 years including surveys, global systematic reviews and interventions within the health system. Overall, we will tell a story of what will enhance early engagement with people to enable earlier intervention on their pathway to safety and healing from the trauma of domestic abuse. The need to work with survivors on an equal basis, acknowledging their lived expertise to guide the direction in research, policy and practice is essential.

Deploying intersectionality to widen conceptualisations of domestic violence and responses to it: Reflections on recent successes and challenges ahead

Chair: Christine Barter

In this presentation, I will chart the progress made in recent years in deploying intersectionality to expand our conceptualisation of domestic violence and abuse to recognise broader categories of harms and lived experiences of a wider range of victim-survivors. I will explore recent successes in materialising these conceptualisations in legal, policy and practice responses to achieve safety and justice for woman and girls – in large part, due to the coalition of feminist activists and academics working together to achieve change. I will also reflect on some of the challenges that lie in current approaches that deploy intersectionality as a means of recognising difference conceptually, politically and legally. I end by anticipating some questions, struggles and opportunities for change that lie ahead.

Gender-based violence is bad for our health: New findings about how violence across the life-course contributes to health problems at the national level.

Chair: Davina James-Hanman

Using data from a specialized population-based study on violence in New Zealand, this presentation outlines the prevalence of multiple types of violence across the life course, and documents how violence experience is associated with physical and mental consequences. Hot-off-the-press research outlines how violence exposure contributes to the national burden of hospitalisations. Gender differences in violence experiences give us clues about why we see different physical and mental health consequences for men and women. Strategies for using the data to influence policy and practice will be discussed.

Consent in Sexual and Affective Relationships

Chair: Stephanie Holt

Sexual consent is so important in any kind of sexual relationship, stable or sporadic, to contribute to both spaces free of violence and preventive socialization where coercion is identified from early ages and beyond. However, the current debate on sexual consent is still clearly insufficient to analyse situations in which despite saying “yes” there might be no consent. The current notion is limited, and thus not safeguarding Young or adult people from sporadic or stable sexual-affective relationships free of violence. Lawyers, police, educators, and other social agents need better criteria to analyse these controversial situations, even when a speech act of “yes” does not involve real consent of a sexual relationship. The lecture will contribute to promoting scientific evidence to prevent any kind of sexual affective relationships with no consent.

Eternal digital violence by perpetrators of domestic violence

Chair: John Devaney

Digital technologies have provided perpetrators with a new gun to harass their victims forever, as well as those who support them. In this lecture, I present my own case as a survivor and the scientific research published until now about this matter. This presentation not only focuses on the analysis of the damage we suffer but also on the actions undertaken by us and our supporters that are successful in overcoming as much as possible the aftermath. Besides, I will present the communicative methodology, one of the most successful approaches for clarifying to the scientific community, the policy makers, and the whole society the best successful survivor actions in the overcoming of digital violence.
